

▶ An Industry That Will Take You Places

It might seem like choosing your career is far off in the future, but it's never too early to start thinking about the paths you could take after high school graduation. Now that you've learned a little about the propane industry from a local propane supplier, you might be wondering about the specific careers you could consider. Here's a quick overview of the industry's most in-demand jobs.

DELIVERY DRIVER

In this position, you get to work with a variety of people, delivering propane to homeowners, agricultural producers, and businesses. It has competitive pay and a work schedule that lets you enjoy life in your community. This position requires a Commercial Driver's License (CDL), which some propane companies will help you obtain.

TRANSPORT DRIVER

People in this position deliver propane to individual propane suppliers across a regional area. Not only do you get to travel, but this position is in high demand across the country (so there are a lot of open jobs for it). Some companies will pay for their transport drivers to get their Commercial Driver's License (CDL).

SERVICE TECHNICIAN

This is a great position for “hands-on” people. Service technicians do everything from setting tanks and running gas lines to installing and fine-tuning propane appliances and equipment. On a day-to-day basis, you’ll work with everyone from home and business owners to plumbers and construction professionals.

CUSTOMER SERVICE REPRESENTATIVES

Do you like helping people solve problems? Customer service representatives help people every day – working with customers to set up their propane service and troubleshooting any other problems that may come up. They’re the face of the propane company, so they have the important job of making sure people feel positive about their entire experience.
